SERVING THOSE WHO MADE UP THE “TIP OF THE SPEAR”

The Navy SEALs, Marine Raiders, Army Green Beret, and their Special Operations support personnel are among the most highly trained men and women on the planet. In military parlance, they are the “Tip of the Spear,” the ones tasked with finding and delivering the Bin Ladens of the world. There is a powerful sense of mission, and when the job ends, whether because of injury or age, these individuals are left with the daunting and sometimes terrifying task of finding a new mission in the civilian world — a place with few obvious parallels to the military and where the value of their training and experience is not always easy to recognize. That was the reason Navy veteran and San Diegan Joe Musselman created The Honor Foundation, which is dedicated to preparing the roughly 2,500 Special Operations personnel who transition from service each year with the tools necessary to craft the next chapter in their lives. >>
